

Andy Haussler Biography

As the Community and Economic Development Director for the City of Clovis, Andy Haussler oversees a wide variety of operations, programs and projects to reach the City's goals. Andy leads the City's economic development efforts including business attraction, affordable housing programs, community improvement grants and major capital improvement projects.

After graduating with honors from Fresno Pacific University, Andy started his career with the global electricity generation leader, AES Corporation, where he marketed and managed electricity contracts in Long Beach. Seeking a return to the Valley, he was hired as a budget analyst for Fresno County where he was exposed to the field of community development and began to apply his financial mind to affordable housing finance, neighborhood revitalization and economic development. Andy has been doing community development work for over 18 years. Andy rounded out his educational experience with an MBA focused on international business, as part of the program he travelled and studied in China and New York City.

Seeking to refine his skills in economic development Andy achieved certifications from both the California Association for Local Economic Development (Accredited California Economic Developer – ACE) and the International Economic Development Council (Certified Economic Developer – CEdC). With his experience, education, and training he has led the City of Clovis to see significant growth in both quality job generation and affordable housing. This has created opportunities for Clovis residents to reach their full potential and the City to prosper.

Andy enjoys spending as much time as possible in the High Sierra with his wife and three children backpacking, hiking, and rock climbing.